

Tuesday's Local Election Candidates profiled

GORDON ALLOTT
U.S. Sen. Gordon Allott, R-Colo., is seeking another six-year term in Tuesday's election to the job that pays $42,000 a year and he is the survey choice over the challenger, Democrat Floyd Haskell.

Allott has a track record of credentials he's used to defend his incumbency: chairman, Senate Republican Policy Committee; ranking minority member, Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee; member, Senate Appropriations Committee; and U.S. delegate to the United Nations; former Lamar city at-large U.S. Representative; and U.S. Representative for Colorado.

He says that his major congressional priorities are: environmental legislation; tax reform; control of inflation and legislation to insure community stability and prosperity.

FLOYD HASKELL
Democrat Floyd Haskell is challenging Tuesday for the U.S. Senate seat held by veteran incumbent, Republican Gordon Allott.

An attorney in the Denver area, Haskell is a former state representative and once held the position of assistant House majority leader. He also headed up the Denver Metropolitan Legal Aid System and is currently on the board of directors of the Urban League of Colorado, Inc.

A former Republican who switched over because "I could no longer abide by the Republican principles," Haskell says that "Congress must reform the tax system so that all Americans, not just lower and middle income people, pay their fair share of taxes."

He also has said that legislation must be found to end the "large amount of control that big corporations and other special interests have over our government."

WILLIAM ARMSTRONG
State Sen. William Armstrong, R-Arapahoe County, is the Republican candidate, and front-runner in Tuesday's election for the new 33rd Congressional District seat.

Armstrong is a radio station owner in the Denver area and, during this past session of the legislature, was Senate majority leader.

He has been an almost ardent supporter of President Nixon's administration, particularly with regard to the president's Vietnam efforts.

And he has warned the Colorado Springs area that George McGovern's proposals to cut back drastically on defense spending would be "a disaster for the Pikes Peak Region and spiral the unemployment rate."

Armstrong is considered the choice in this race because of his political makeup of the past 10 years and a retired Army chief warrant officer.

He also is one of two blacks running for this new district which El Paso County gained through the 1970 Federal census.

BYRON JOHNSON
Byron Johnson, a former congressman, state senator, teacher and economist, is the Democratic candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in Tuesday's election.

Johnson wrote the first "work incentive provisions" into the Social Security Amendments in 1960 and is said to have advocated recognition of China by the U.N. 12 years before President Nixon and his advisor, Henry Kissinger, agreed.

He is running in the new 33rd Congressional District, which Colorado gained because of increased population in the 1970 Federal census.

An ardent liberal, Johnson is attacked by the Supreme Court decisions on the right to privacy by saying: "We must stop the systematic corrosion of the principle that a man's home is his castle. The Nixon Administration is encouraging the unlimited access to the most intimate details of every American's life experience with computer data banks."

PIPP M. BOYLS
Pipp Marshall Boyls, 28, is the Libertarian Party candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat Tuesday.

A Harvard Law School graduate, Boyls is a contributing editor for Shepard's Citations and is general counsel for Culbreath-West.

He is the co-founder of the seventh-grade education, Saturday, and chairman of the party's national platform committee.

He says that "I am the only candidate recognizing the individual's right to sole dominion over his own life, so long as that right doesn't interfere with the equal rights of others."

Boyls says that one of his priority aims is to "reduce government spending, reduce taxes, and begin the process of ending government manipulation of our lives."

FRANK EVANS
Rep. Frank Evans, D-Colo., was swept into Congress eight years ago on the landslide wave of Lyndon Johnson, has won a second term in Tuesday's election.

Evans says he fears he might think that has concerned him lately is the size of his district, represented by the Republican-dominated state legislature, and the fact that presidential aspirant George McGovern is running so far behind in the polls to President Nixon.

U.S. Delegate to the United States House of Representatives, Evans was caught in a Republican landslide of the proportions Johnson used eight years ago.

And the size of the district, which stretches across southern Colorado from the Kansas to Utah borders, including 33 counties, is only marginally Democratic despite state Republicanism calling it a "safe Evans district."

He has maintained a profile of independence from McGovern and figures he can use the marginal lead he already has in the district to win again.

CHARLES BRADY
Dr. Charles (Chuck) Brady of Pueblo is seeking the 32nd Congressional District seat Tuesday against the popular incumbent Frank Evans.

Republican Brady was said to be trailing Democrat Evans by a wide margin in a Denver area, but that was changed when the largest congressional districts in the nation.

This district used to encompass all of metro Colorado Springs, but that was changed when the Republican-dominated state legislature split the district.

Brady said he decided to run because the voters' choice, and because Evans is a lawyer "and there are already too many lawyers in Congress."

Unlike his opponent, Brady has been a staunch advocate of President Nixon's revenue-sharing program, contending that the Federal government has the expertise "to turn some of the national wealth to local communities to strengthen them."

FLOYD PETTIE
Colorado Springs City Councilman Floyd Pettie is the Republican candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in the 1970s Representative District.

Pettie has lived in his neighborhood for 15 years, operating his own business for the better part of 10 years and a retired Army chief warrant officer.

He also is one of two blacks running for this new district which El Paso County gained through the 1970 Federal census.

BYRON JOHNSON
Byron Johnson, a former congressman, state senator, teacher and economist, is the Democratic candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in Tuesday's election.

Johnson wrote the first "work incentive provisions" into the Social Security Amendments in 1960 and is said to have advocated recognition of China by the U.N. 12 years before President Nixon and his advisor, Henry Kissinger, agreed.

He is running in the new 33rd Congressional District, which Colorado gained because of increased population in the 1970 Federal census.

An ardent liberal, Johnson is attacked by the Supreme Court decisions on the right to privacy by saying: "We must stop the systematic corrosion of the principle that a man's home is his castle. The Nixon Administration is encouraging the unlimited access to the most intimate details of every American's life experience with computer data banks."

PIPP M. BOYLS
Pipp Marshall Boyls, 28, is the Libertarian Party candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat Tuesday.

A Harvard Law School graduate, Boyls is a contributing editor for Shepard's Citations and is general counsel for Culbreath-West.

He is the co-founder of the seventh-grade education, Saturday, and chairman of the party's national platform committee.

He says that "I am the only candidate recognizing the individual's right to sole dominion over his own life, so long as that right doesn't interfere with the equal rights of others."

Boyls says that one of his priority aims is to "reduce government spending, reduce taxes, and begin the process of ending government manipulation of our lives."

FRANK EVANS
Rep. Frank Evans, D-Colo., was swept into Congress eight years ago on the landslide wave of Lyndon Johnson, has won a second term in Tuesday's election.

Evans says he fears he might think that has concerned him lately is the size of his district, represented by the Republican-dominated state legislature, and the fact that presidential aspirant George McGovern is running so far behind in the polls to President Nixon.

U.S. Delegate to the United States House of Representatives, Evans was caught in a Republican landslide of the proportions Johnson used eight years ago.

And the size of the district, which stretches across southern Colorado from the Kansas to Utah borders, including 33 counties, is only marginally Democratic despite state Republicanism calling it a "safe Evans district."

He has maintained a profile of independence from McGovern and figures he can use the marginal lead he already has in the district to win again.

CHARLES BRADY
Dr. Charles (Chuck) Brady of Pueblo is seeking the 32nd Congressional District seat Tuesday against the popular incumbent Frank Evans.

Republican Brady was said to be trailing Democrat Evans by a wide margin in a Denver area, but that was changed when the largest congressional districts in the nation.

This district used to encompass all of metro Colorado Springs, but that was changed when the Republican-dominated state legislature split the district.

Brady said he decided to run because the voters' choice, and because Evans is a lawyer "and there are already too many lawyers in Congress."

Unlike his opponent, Brady has been a staunch advocate of President Nixon's revenue-sharing program, contending that the Federal government has the expertise "to turn some of the national wealth to local communities to strengthen them."

FLOYD PETTIE
Colorado Springs City Councilman Floyd Pettie is the Republican candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in the 1970s Representative District.

Pettie has lived in his neighborhood for 15 years, operating his own business for the better part of 10 years and a retired Army chief warrant officer.

He also is one of two blacks running for this new district which El Paso County gained through the 1970 Federal census.

BYRON JOHNSON
Byron Johnson, a former congressman, state senator, teacher and economist, is the Democratic candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in Tuesday's election.

Johnson wrote the first "work incentive provisions" into the Social Security Amendments in 1960 and is said to have advocated recognition of China by the U.N. 12 years before President Nixon and his advisor, Henry Kissinger, agreed.

He is running in the new 33rd Congressional District, which Colorado gained because of increased population in the 1970 Federal census.

An ardent liberal, Johnson is attacked by the Supreme Court decisions on the right to privacy by saying: "We must stop the systematic corrosion of the principle that a man's home is his castle. The Nixon Administration is encouraging the unlimited access to the most intimate details of every American's life experience with computer data banks."

PIPP M. BOYLS
Pipp Marshall Boyls, 28, is the Libertarian Party candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat Tuesday.

A Harvard Law School graduate, Boyls is a contributing editor for Shepard's Citations and is general counsel for Culbreath-West.

He is the co-founder of the seventh-grade education, Saturday, and chairman of the party's national platform committee.

He says that "I am the only candidate recognizing the individual's right to sole dominion over his own life, so long as that right doesn't interfere with the equal rights of others."

Boyls says that one of his priority aims is to "reduce government spending, reduce taxes, and begin the process of ending government manipulation of our lives."

FRANK EVANS
Rep. Frank Evans, D-Colo., was swept into Congress eight years ago on the landslide wave of Lyndon Johnson, has won a second term in Tuesday's election.

Evans says he fears he might think that has concerned him lately is the size of his district, represented by the Republican-dominated state legislature, and the fact that presidential aspirant George McGovern is running so far behind in the polls to President Nixon.

U.S. Delegate to the United States House of Representatives, Evans was caught in a Republican landslide of the proportions Johnson used eight years ago.

And the size of the district, which stretches across southern Colorado from the Kansas to Utah borders, including 33 counties, is only marginally Democratic despite state Republicanism calling it a "safe Evans district."

He has maintained a profile of independence from McGovern and figures he can use the marginal lead he already has in the district to win again.

CHARLES BRADY
Dr. Charles (Chuck) Brady of Pueblo is seeking the 32nd Congressional District seat Tuesday against the popular incumbent Frank Evans.

Republican Brady was said to be trailing Democrat Evans by a wide margin in a Denver area, but that was changed when the largest congressional districts in the nation.

This district used to encompass all of metro Colorado Springs, but that was changed when the Republican-dominated state legislature split the district.

Brady said he decided to run because the voters' choice, and because Evans is a lawyer "and there are already too many lawyers in Congress."

Unlike his opponent, Brady has been a staunch advocate of President Nixon's revenue-sharing program, contending that the Federal government has the expertise "to turn some of the national wealth to local communities to strengthen them."

FLOYD PETTIE
Colorado Springs City Councilman Floyd Pettie is the Republican candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in the 1970s Representative District.

Pettie has lived in his neighborhood for 15 years, operating his own business for the better part of 10 years and a retired Army chief warrant officer.

He also is one of two blacks running for this new district which El Paso County gained through the 1970 Federal census.

BYRON JOHNSON
Byron Johnson, a former congressman, state senator, teacher and economist, is the Democratic candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in Tuesday's election.

Johnson wrote the first "work incentive provisions" into the Social Security Amendments in 1960 and is said to have advocated recognition of China by the U.N. 12 years before President Nixon and his advisor, Henry Kissinger, agreed.

He is running in the new 33rd Congressional District, which Colorado gained because of increased population in the 1970 Federal census.

An ardent liberal, Johnson is attacked by the Supreme Court decisions on the right to privacy by saying: "We must stop the systematic corrosion of the principle that a man's home is his castle. The Nixon Administration is encouraging the unlimited access to the most intimate details of every American's life experience with computer data banks."

PIPP M. BOYLS
Pipp Marshall Boyls, 28, is the Libertarian Party candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat Tuesday.

A Harvard Law School graduate, Boyls is a contributing editor for Shepard's Citations and is general counsel for Culbreath-West.

He is the co-founder of the seventh-grade education, Saturday, and chairman of the party's national platform committee.

He says that "I am the only candidate recognizing the individual's right to sole dominion over his own life, so long as that right doesn't interfere with the equal rights of others."

Boyls says that one of his priority aims is to "reduce government spending, reduce taxes, and begin the process of ending government manipulation of our lives."

FRANK EVANS
Rep. Frank Evans, D-Colo., was swept into Congress eight years ago on the landslide wave of Lyndon Johnson, has won a second term in Tuesday's election.

Evans says he fears he might think that has concerned him lately is the size of his district, represented by the Republican-dominated state legislature, and the fact that presidential aspirant George McGovern is running so far behind in the polls to President Nixon.

U.S. Delegate to the United States House of Representatives, Evans was caught in a Republican landslide of the proportions Johnson used eight years ago.

And the size of the district, which stretches across southern Colorado from the Kansas to Utah borders, including 33 counties, is only marginally Democratic despite state Republicanism calling it a "safe Evans district."

He has maintained a profile of independence from McGovern and figures he can use the marginal lead he already has in the district to win again.

CHARLES BRADY
Dr. Charles (Chuck) Brady of Pueblo is seeking the 32nd Congressional District seat Tuesday against the popular incumbent Frank Evans.

Republican Brady was said to be trailing Democrat Evans by a wide margin in a Denver area, but that was changed when the largest congressional districts in the nation.

This district used to encompass all of metro Colorado Springs, but that was changed when the Republican-dominated state legislature split the district.

Brady said he decided to run because the voters' choice, and because Evans is a lawyer "and there are already too many lawyers in Congress."

Unlike his opponent, Brady has been a staunch advocate of President Nixon's revenue-sharing program, contending that the Federal government has the expertise "to turn some of the national wealth to local communities to strengthen them."

FLOYD PETTIE
Colorado Springs City Councilman Floyd Pettie is the Republican candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in the 1970s Representative District.

Pettie has lived in his neighborhood for 15 years, operating his own business for the better part of 10 years and a retired Army chief warrant officer.

He also is one of two blacks running for this new district which El Paso County gained through the 1970 Federal census.

BYRON JOHNSON
Byron Johnson, a former congressman, state senator, teacher and economist, is the Democratic candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in Tuesday's election.

Johnson wrote the first "work incentive provisions" into the Social Security Amendments in 1960 and is said to have advocated recognition of China by the U.N. 12 years before President Nixon and his advisor, Henry Kissinger, agreed.

He is running in the new 33rd Congressional District, which Colorado gained because of increased population in the 1970 Federal census.

An ardent liberal, Johnson is attacked by the Supreme Court decisions on the right to privacy by saying: "We must stop the systematic corrosion of the principle that a man's home is his castle. The Nixon Administration is encouraging the unlimited access to the most intimate details of every American's life experience with computer data banks."

PIPP M. BOYLS
Pipp Marshall Boyls, 28, is the Libertarian Party candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat Tuesday.

A Harvard Law School graduate, Boyls is a contributing editor for Shepard's Citations and is general counsel for Culbreath-West.

He is the co-founder of the seventh-grade education, Saturday, and chairman of the party's national platform committee.

He says that "I am the only candidate recognizing the individual's right to sole dominion over his own life, so long as that right doesn't interfere with the equal rights of others."

Boyls says that one of his priority aims is to "reduce government spending, reduce taxes, and begin the process of ending government manipulation of our lives."

FRANK EVANS
Rep. Frank Evans, D-Colo., was swept into Congress eight years ago on the landslide wave of Lyndon Johnson, has won a second term in Tuesday's election.

Evans says he fears he might think that has concerned him lately is the size of his district, represented by the Republican-dominated state legislature, and the fact that presidential aspirant George McGovern is running so far behind in the polls to President Nixon.

U.S. Delegate to the United States House of Representatives, Evans was caught in a Republican landslide of the proportions Johnson used eight years ago.

And the size of the district, which stretches across southern Colorado from the Kansas to Utah borders, including 33 counties, is only marginally Democratic despite state Republicanism calling it a "safe Evans district."

He has maintained a profile of independence from McGovern and figures he can use the marginal lead he already has in the district to win again.

CHARLES BRADY
Dr. Charles (Chuck) Brady of Pueblo is seeking the 32nd Congressional District seat Tuesday against the popular incumbent Frank Evans.

Republican Brady was said to be trailing Democrat Evans by a wide margin in a Denver area, but that was changed when the largest congressional districts in the nation.

This district used to encompass all of metro Colorado Springs, but that was changed when the Republican-dominated state legislature split the district.

Brady said he decided to run because the voters' choice, and because Evans is a lawyer "and there are already too many lawyers in Congress."

Unlike his opponent, Brady has been a staunch advocate of President Nixon's revenue-sharing program, contending that the Federal government has the expertise "to turn some of the national wealth to local communities to strengthen them."

FLOYD PETTIE
Colorado Springs City Councilman Floyd Pettie is the Republican candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in the 1970s Representative District.

Pettie has lived in his neighborhood for 15 years, operating his own business for the better part of 10 years and a retired Army chief warrant officer.

He also is one of two blacks running for this new district which El Paso County gained through the 1970 Federal census.

BYRON JOHNSON
Byron Johnson, a former congressman, state senator, teacher and economist, is the Democratic candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in Tuesday's election.

Johnson wrote the first "work incentive provisions" into the Social Security Amendments in 1960 and is said to have advocated recognition of China by the U.N. 12 years before President Nixon and his advisor, Henry Kissinger, agreed.

He is running in the new 33rd Congressional District, which Colorado gained because of increased population in the 1970 Federal census.

An ardent liberal, Johnson is attacked by the Supreme Court decisions on the right to privacy by saying: "We must stop the systematic corrosion of the principle that a man's home is his castle. The Nixon Administration is encouraging the unlimited access to the most intimate details of every American's life experience with computer data banks."

PIPP M. BOYLS
Pipp Marshall Boyls, 28, is the Libertarian Party candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat Tuesday.

A Harvard Law School graduate, Boyls is a contributing editor for Shepard's Citations and is general counsel for Culbreath-West.

He is the co-founder of the seventh-grade education, Saturday, and chairman of the party's national platform committee.

He says that "I am the only candidate recognizing the individual's right to sole dominion over his own life, so long as that right doesn't interfere with the equal rights of others."

Boyls says that one of his priority aims is to "reduce government spending, reduce taxes, and begin the process of ending government manipulation of our lives."

FRANK EVANS
Rep. Frank Evans, D-Colo., was swept into Congress eight years ago on the landslide wave of Lyndon Johnson, has won a second term in Tuesday's election.

Evans says he fears he might think that has concerned him lately is the size of his district, represented by the Republican-dominated state legislature, and the fact that presidential aspirant George McGovern is running so far behind in the polls to President Nixon.

U.S. Delegate to the United States House of Representatives, Evans was caught in a Republican landslide of the proportions Johnson used eight years ago.

And the size of the district, which stretches across southern Colorado from the Kansas to Utah borders, including 33 counties, is only marginally Democratic despite state Republicanism calling it a "safe Evans district."

He has maintained a profile of independence from McGovern and figures he can use the marginal lead he already has in the district to win again.

CHARLES BRADY
Dr. Charles (Chuck) Brady of Pueblo is seeking the 32nd Congressional District seat Tuesday against the popular incumbent Frank Evans.

Republican Brady was said to be trailing Democrat Evans by a wide margin in a Denver area, but that was changed when the largest congressional districts in the nation.

This district used to encompass all of metro Colorado Springs, but that was changed when the Republican-dominated state legislature split the district.

Brady said he decided to run because the voters' choice, and because Evans is a lawyer "and there are already too many lawyers in Congress."

Unlike his opponent, Brady has been a staunch advocate of President Nixon's revenue-sharing program, contending that the Federal government has the expertise "to turn some of the national wealth to local communities to strengthen them."

FLOYD PETTIE
Colorado Springs City Councilman Floyd Pettie is the Republican candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in the 1970s Representative District.

Pettie has lived in his neighborhood for 15 years, operating his own business for the better part of 10 years and a retired Army chief warrant officer.

He also is one of two blacks running for this new district which El Paso County gained through the 1970 Federal census.

BYRON JOHNSON
Byron Johnson, a former congressman, state senator, teacher and economist, is the Democratic candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat in Tuesday's election.

Johnson wrote the first "work incentive provisions" into the Social Security Amendments in 1960 and is said to have advocated recognition of China by the U.N. 12 years before President Nixon and his advisor, Henry Kissinger, agreed.

He is running in the new 33rd Congressional District, which Colorado gained because of increased population in the 1970 Federal census.

An ardent liberal, Johnson is attacked by the Supreme Court decisions on the right to privacy by saying: "We must stop the systematic corrosion of the principle that a man's home is his castle. The Nixon Administration is encouraging the unlimited access to the most intimate details of every American's life experience with computer data banks."

PIPP M. BOYLS
Pipp Marshall Boyls, 28, is the Libertarian Party candidate for the new 33rd Congressional District seat Tuesday.

A Harvard Law School graduate, Boyls is a contributing editor for Shepard's Citations and is general counsel for Culbreath-West.

He is the co-founder of the seventh-grade education, Saturday, and chairman of the party's national platform committee.

He says that "I am the only candidate recognizing the individual's right to sole dominion over his own life, so long as that right doesn't interfere with the equal rights of others."

Boyls says that one of his priority aims is to "reduce government spending, reduce taxes, and begin the process of ending government manipulation of our lives."

FRANK EVANS
Rep. Frank Evans, D-Colo., was swept into Congress eight years ago on the landslide wave of Lyndon Johnson, has won a second term in Tuesday's election.

Evans says he fears he might think that has concerned him lately is the size of his district, represented by the Republican-dominated state legislature, and the fact that presidential aspirant George McGovern is running so far behind in the polls to President Nixon.

U.S. Delegate to the United States House of Representatives, Evans was caught in a Republican landslide of the proportions Johnson used eight years ago.

And the size of the district, which stretches across southern Colorado from the Kansas to Utah borders, including 33 counties, is only marginally Democratic despite state Republicanism calling it a "safe Evans district."

He has maintained a profile of independence from McGovern and figures he can use the marginal lead he already has in the district to win again.

CHARLES BRADY
Dr. Charles (Chuck) Brady of Pueblo is seeking the 32nd Congressional District seat Tuesday against the popular incumbent Frank Evans.

Republican Brady was said to be trailing Democrat Evans by a wide margin in a Denver area, but that was changed when the largest congressional districts in the nation.

This district used to encompass all of metro Colorado Springs, but that was changed when the Republican-dominated state legislature split the district.

Brady said he decided to run because the voters' choice, and because Evans is a lawyer "and there are already too many